A Pictorial History of the World War II POW Camp

Camp Tyson was a World War II prisoner of war camp that housed German prisoners from 1943 to 1946. The camp was located in New Johnsonville, Tennessee, and was one of the largest POW camps in the United States. At its peak, Camp Tyson housed over 10,000 prisoners.

The prisoners at Camp Tyson were mostly captured in North Africa and Italy. They were brought to the United States and interned at Camp Tyson until the end of the war. The prisoners were guarded by American soldiers, and they were required to work on the camp's farms and factories.

Conditions at Camp Tyson were harsh. The prisoners lived in barracks that were overcrowded and unsanitary. They were also subjected to hard labor and often suffered from malnutrition and disease.

Despite the harsh conditions, the prisoners at Camp Tyson found ways to make the best of their situation. They organized sports teams, musical groups, and educational programs. They also practiced their religion and celebrated their holidays.

The prisoners at Camp Tyson were mostly captured in North Africa and Italy. They were brought to the United States and interned at Camp Tyson until the end of the war.

In 1946, the prisoners at Camp Tyson were repatriated to Germany. The camp was then closed and abandoned. Today, the site of Camp Tyson is a state park. The park includes a museum that tells the story of the camp and the prisoners who lived there.
