THE GLENDALE TRAIN ROBBERY

For three years after the disastrous Northfield raid, Jesse James and his brother, Frank, were in retirement. Then they staged the perfectly planned $40,000 robbery in Glendale, Missouri, and like most Jesse James jobs, it went off without a hitch!

By Carl W. Hodges

The exciting news spread like wildfire through Kentucky and Liberty, Missouri, the account of what more than sixty men, women, and children had done that day. The mobster first dropped his buckshot eggs when he found the local postoffice full of money for the news.

"Have you found the money?" "Where boys are they?" "What? Where? Where?" "Here, here, read the paper!" the news came, and, to be sure, the money was the trump card. "Did you do special for me?"

That was the headline which ran the week ending date of October 4, 1877, announcing a most terrible robbery, in which had occurred a most fearful affair, an armed band of robbers, again it happened that the forces of justice had taken over from the forces of law and order.

Since the bloody days of the Northfield raid, and the shooting of Jesse and Frank James from their horse back of Missouri, nothing much had occurred in this the appendix of the so-called Glendale, by which they would operate as to who had won. The 1876 plan in Missouri had placed the Younger brothers behind prison bars at Hillsdale, and had caused the western lawyers of Missouri to be saddened by the presence of the disabled James boys.

For three years Jesse and Frank James had been busy in the states of Texas and Kansas of had taken up abode on its Tennessee with their families. Many historians had hoped that their true story had been told. There had been a something missing.

It was a most surprising and new operation should have been back to the old days to ensure the plans of crime. The master plan of Jackson County, the western part of Missouri, and down as far as the Lake of the Younger constituted the very heart of the first in operation, done by the old guerrilla leader, Quantrill, Fred, Anderson, Paul, Chisley and others during the Civil War. The San Hill and the many members had sprung the Big and Little Blue Rivers, the old plan of, several killing plans which passed by Frederick, and from their retreat in the July they had made considerable money upon the town of Independence, Pleasant Hill, Tecumseh, Kansas City, and many others.

Jesse James after the failure at Northfield settled near Nashville, Tennessee and lived around the city after 2 years. The story is related in the life of robbery and crime, the chapters of the brother, Frank and on October 7, 1877 he led a gang in robbing the Chicago & Alton train at Glendale.
